Stem Cells are Real and They're Here to Stay - BioPharming Basics - 2006

Say you want to grow a great vegetable, you find a seed, and they are tiny, and you find it from a whole field, choosing seeds near the best fruits. Then you take that seed (Stem Cell), and you put it where it can grow, in this instance, biotissue pharmed inside a biopharm. So what happens when you take a cell from a donor? Your DNA changes and you become a cross breed, a chimera, but it works.

The Iron Age, The Copper age, the Golden Age and the Silicon Age (My Supposition)

Mammals adapt to living conditions, and when those adaptations become essential to survival, mates are chosen and gene expressions are passed via dna into children. Did copper miners suffer extremes that are still with us as genetic predispositions, such as tuberculosis? Did the Iron age lead to anemia? Can we see genetic damage or low birth rates during golden ages (I know, bear with me), as gold mining and exposure to gold causes dna damage. In the event you missed key evolution theories such as mega fauna and insular island dwarfism, it's about time to consider that man evolved from giant ape, rather than tiny monkey, and every single great, great grand parent in our genetic line is represented in the now. That's a lot a history!
